Course Description:

This private lesson course will serve to hone skills while broadening and deepening exposure to contemporary music technology practice. Through individually tailored assignments, focused readings, and guided listening, the student will gain insight into and context for their specific goals. The semester will typically culminate in a major project proposed by the student and approved by the instructor. This could take the form of a composition, performance, recording, printed score, computer program, or other suitable format for the student's music technology work.

As this is a one-on-one lesson, regular communication is crucial. Enrollment in this course is a contract between the student and the instructor. Private lesson study assumes a highly disciplined approach by both participants, and regular & prompt attendance is required. Regular and systematic work outside the lesson is required, typically on the order of an hour or more per day. After the third week of classes, withdrawal from private lessons will only be allowed in well-documented extenuating circumstances and MUST be approved by both the CMP Director and the VP for Academic and Student Affairs.

Expectations Concerning Student Work:
